EGYPT AND ABYSSINIA.

The Council of Ministers on Tuesday last approved the statutes of the Bank of Abyssinia, which has been founded under the aegis of the National Bank of Egypt. The establishment of this bank under direct Anglo-Egyptian influence is an event of extreme political significance, for banks are quite as useful as mi-nistrars as badging of "peaceful penetration." The official approval of the bank's statutes comes most opportunely, as in a few days' time the Abyssinian convention between the British, French, and Italian Governments will be signed. As the "Times" remarks, "the agreement thus concluded between Great Britain, France, and Italy, while safeguarding their several interests without infringing the sovereignty and independence of the Emperor Menelik, will be a boon to the commerce of the world by opening up the vast resources of Abyssinia to international trade and industry."

But Abyssinia is of greater importance to us than it can ever be to France or Italy for the frontier line between the Sudan and Abyssinia is a very long one, and the richest part of Abyssinia lies in a strip along the eastern frontier of the Sudan. Since commenced for six hundred and thirty miles of the world, and inhabited by men who, unlike their conquerors, are both industrious and profitable, and provided with the remembrance of oppression to struggle, and probably ready to seize the hand of any liberator that may present himself. Finally there is the link that binds the two countries, and always will form a political contract, Egypt, for whose prosperity we are responsible to the world, has the bay road of her existence in Central Abyssinia. It has been threatened in former centuries, but what was a vain menace in the days of Lalabala, King in the Thirteenth Century, or even later when the Portuguese, the Portuguese, gave counsel to the reigning King to cut off the spring of Egyptian fertility, might in these days of that modern Trade the engineer produce at least a grave political situation. If anyone will cast up the sum of these various forces he will see a strong family likeness between them and those in other parts of the world which have combined to bring the British into conflict with the ambitions and interests of other European Powers.

In this connection it is worth recalling the fact that at Addis Ababa, great efforts were made by a German group to obtain a concession for a National State Bank. This concession, however, was refused, owing to the representations of our able minister, Sir John Harrington, and instead a similar concession was granted to the National Bank of Egypt.
The establishment of the new bank will open a new era in Abyssinia and Anglo-Egyptian relations, and a great future lies before the bank. Abyssinia only needs capital for its development, and cannot be truly independent if any other European Power exercises a predominant control over the machinery that supplies the motive power of material advance.
